

Understanding the House Tree Person Test (HTP)

The Hou

se Tree Person Test (HTP), a projective personality test, was developed in 1948, and updated in 1969. In the HTP, the test taker is asked to draw houses, trees, and persons in the belief that these drawings provide a certain measure of self-perceptions and attitudes. Over the years, several innovative variations have been introduced to further enrich the HTP.

The HTP is scored in both an objective quantitative mode and a subjective qualitative mode. The quantitative scoring scheme involves analyzing the details of drawings to derive a general assessment of intelligence. However, the primary use of the HTP is related to the qualitative scoring scheme in which the test administrator subjectively interprets the test-takers' drawings and responses to questions. Since the qualitative scoring is largely subjective, scoring and interpreting the HTP is difficult and administrators of the HTP should be properly trained.

In this one-day workshop, the focus will be placed upon qualitative scoring. The variations mentioned above will also be introduced.

Counselors and social workers are welcome to attend this course.
